The New York Daily Times.

This paper has just completed the second year of ts existence, and its enterprising proprietors have entered upon the third year with full confidence that their prosperity hereafter will be as complete as their success has been heretofore. We have no hesitation in saying that they richly deserve the success which has attended their enterprise. The following statistics given by the editors indicate strongly the prosperous condition of this concern:

"Very few persons have any idea of the magnitude of the business of a daily newspaper. The sheet found every morning on the breakfast table of which two cents is the paltry representative, suggests no such scale of expenditure or of labor, as its proper and prompt preparation involves.
